Shots fired at patrol in Gaza Strip

Gunshots were fired at an IDF patrol west of Khan Yunis in the Gaza Strip yesterday, but they missed, military sources said. The soldiers returned fire and opened searches. The IDF informed the Palestinian Police and both sides are investigating. Meanwhile, in Nablus, Palestinian police handed over to the IDF two RPGs which were discovered in the city. IDF sappers blew them up, military sources said. Arieh O'Sullivan

Renovations at Western Wall Plaza

The Ministry of Religious Affairs yesterday announced a NIS 15 million renovation project at the Western Wall Plaza, to include new approach roads, bathrooms, lighting, and expanding the plaza area to accommodate up to 40,000 visitors at the same time. The renovations are to be completed in time for Israel's jubilee year, during which some 4 million visitors are expected, compared to some 2.5 million this year. Jerusalem Post Staff

Two killed on roads

Efraim Mousa, 70, of Moshav Heletz, was killed yesterday afternoon when he was hit by a truck while crossing a road near the moshav. Salami Abu Medeis, 27, of Rahat, died last night of injuries suffered when his car ran off the road into a ditch north of Beersheba. In Jerusalem, a man was lightly injured in a collision among three cars and a tractor. Itim

Man held for threatening attacks

Majabed Nueirat, 26, of Kafir Meitalon, near Jenin, was remanded for 10 days by Haifa Magistrate's Court yesterday. He had threatened to carry out attacks and murder Jews unless he received financial support and other assistance from the General Security Service. Itim

PM: Charges against Manbar 'very grave'

Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu said yesterday that the charges brought against Nahum Manbar "are very grave, some of the most serious ever made against an Israeli citizen. The court will have to rule on the matter. We know we face dangers, even if we progress in our peace process, as I believe we will, and come to a peace agreement with our neighbors. There will still be states in the Middle East in which there is great doubt that they understand they too must join the peace process. The most dangerous of them is certainly Iran, so it is important for us that these sort of phenomena be uprooted." Arieh O'Sullivan

PA policeman jailed for killing car passenger

A Palestinian policeman, who on Monday shot at a car, which he said passed a roadblock near Hebron without stopping, and killed a passenger, was sentenced to 15 years in prison yesterday. Mohammed Ismail Hasan, 20, was brought before a security court after the driver Sawad Taha, 22, identified him as the policeman who fired on their car, hitting passenger Issam Gheith, 28, in the back. Taha said there was no roadblock at the spot and that he passed that way several times a day, between Hebron and his shoe factory in Dahiyet el-Bereid. Jon Inmanuel

Arbitration requested in Civil Service dispute

Treasury wage director Yossi Kucik yesterday submitted a request to the Civil Service arbitrator to consider the wage dispute between some 10,000 workers at 15 ministries and the Treasury. The Treasury spokesman said last night in a statement that the move came after repeated attempts to reach an agreement with the workers had failed. Itim

YITZHAR

The Land of Israel Front, led by MK Michael Kleiner (Geshet-Likud), also condemned the incident. Kleiner said that if Mordchai personally authorized the measures, MKs from the caucus would not support the government in a no-confidence vote on the issue.

Kleiner said if Dayan acted on his own accord, he should be replaced by someone who could work with the Jewish residents. He accused Dayan of going behind the residents back by holding negotiations with them over the homes at the same time the decision to destroy them was taken.

Molelet leader Rehavam Ze'evi accused the government of "not making a sound about the uncontrolled and wild building by the Arabs."

Labor Party secretary-general Nissim Zvilli, on the other hand, said: "That MKs give their backing to settlers who break the law and harm soldiers and policemen is fraught with danger and has led in the past to serious consequences. The verbal attacks by some coalition MKs - particularly in the NRP - on IDF officers can only be condemned."

Meretz leader Yossi Sarid said: "The authorities did their duty by destroying the illegal structures in Yitzhar. Yitzhar is a settlement of unlawful and dangerous people and they should be dealt with as one deals with criminals who refuse to accept law and order. The NRP wants to turn the IDF and police into the government's envoys in a criminal act, but the IDF and the police are not the NRP, and they will continue to fulfill their duty."

In a related development, police acting on Dayan's orders arrived at the homes of six residents in Kiryat Arba yesterday, demanding they hand over their IDF-issued weapons. The six include three reserve officers, one of them Yisrael Blumenthal, a battalion commander.

Blumenthal told Arutz 7 yesterday that he would not hand over his weapon, calling it a "death sentence" for him especially, as Arabs are stepping up their attacks against Jews in the region.

Abd-Rabbo also said that Arafat sent a letter to Netanyahu saying that, before other talks can resume, there must be an end to building settlements.

It was not clear whether the Palestinians would be prepared to resume substantive talks as long as the Har Homa dispute remained unresolved.

Weizman arrived at Erez at 5:30 p.m., accompanied by bureau chief Arye Shumer, military aide Col. Shimon Hefetz, and Netanyahu's adviser, attorney Yitzhak Molcho.

Some 20 minutes later, Arafat stepped out of his car, the two shook hands, smiled for the cameras, then entered the building for the meeting.

Arafat was accompanied by Abd-Rabbo, chief negotiator Saeb Erekat, and spokesmen Marwan Kanafani and Nabil Abu Rudeineh.

The meeting lasted two hours and toward the end Weizman and Arafat conferred privately. After the meeting, Weizman called Netanyahu and updated him on the results of the meeting. The two are expected to meet today to discuss the meeting in detail.

Several coalition figures sharply criticized Weizman's meeting with Arafat, expressing doubt that it was initiated with Netanyahu's consent.

Agriculture Minister Rafael Eitan of Tsomet pronounced the meeting "totally useless. But beyond being superfluous from a practical point of view, it does damage to our national sense of self-respect. It shames not only us collectively, but it also shames Weizman personally."

Molelet leader Rehavam Ze'evi accused the president of "sticking his nose in matters that do not concern him. It is not the president's job to find a diplomatic compromise."

Lior Collins and Sarah Honig contributed to this report.

Beilin: Hassan to visit soon

By MICHAEL YUDELMAN, SARAH HONIG, and ALLISON KAPLAN SOMMER

Labor MK Yossi Beilin said yesterday he had persuaded Jordan's Crown Prince Hassan to come to Israel to meet President Ezer Weizman, Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu, members of Knesset and students in the near future.

Beilin met Hassan, Prime Minister Abdul-Salam Majali and Foreign Minister Faiz Tarame in Amman yesterday as part of his personal initiative to revive the peace process.

Beilin's visit caused Netanyahu's office embarrassment, in view of the tension with Jordan over the water agreement and Hassan's cancellation of his meeting with Netanyahu in Naharayim yesterday. Sources in the Prime Minister's Office criticized Beilin for meeting Jordanian leaders without coordinating the move with the government.

The sources also charged Beilin, who is running for Labor's leadership, of going to Jordan as part of his primaries campaign.

"I want to remind the Prime Minister's Office that I am not a civil servant or government worker. I am one of the opposition leaders and I will do everything in my power to move the peace process forward, because in my eyes there is no national interest of greater importance," Beilin said.

Beilin and Hassan reportedly agreed that stopping the peace talks constitutes self-punishment, and punishes all who want peace on both sides.

Hassan reportedly told Beilin in the meeting that it was not the Jordanians who had canceled the events at Naharayim, but the Israelis, and that he would have attended the ceremony as a private person.

Hassan, who said he has been getting many invitations by Israeli students and politicians, expressed an interest in coming here and meeting people, especially students, before the end of the school year. Beilin expressed regret that the meeting with Netanyahu and Hassan did not take place, "but because I had the opportunity to meet with the Jordanian leaders and give them the opportunity to express themselves, I hope I contributed to reduce the mini-crisis between Jordan and Israel."

The Likud yesterday blasted Beilin for "seeking to conduct private foreign policy despite the fact that he knows he represents no one and can commit the state of Israel to nothing."

In an official statement the party spokeswoman said that "unfortunately this charade is not funny because while Beilin is scurrying around the Middle East, he undermines the legitimate diplomatic process undertaken by the legitimate democratically elected government of Israel, which alone is authorized to negotiate on behalf of the state. Beilin may not approve, but the rules of the democratic game are that there is only one government at a time."

The Likud charged that "Beilin is seeking to advance his own political cause in the upcoming Labor primaries by appointing himself to conduct diplomatic contacts, but the message this imparts to the other side is that Labor will be ready for far greater concessions than this government is. This sabotages Israel's negotiating position and makes it impossible to put forth a unified position even as regards Israel's most vital existential interests."

Supporters of Labor leadership frontrunner MK Ehud Barak said Beilin's moves were solely an attempt to overtake Barak's lead. A Labor MK formerly closely associated with Beilin said last night that "what we are witnessing is an immature show-off performance."

IAF hits Hizbullah targets in Lebanon

By DAVID RUDGE

The IAF blasted Hizbullah targets in south Lebanon yesterday afternoon, as at least one gunman was reported to have been killed in heavy fighting in the region.

Two Lebanese civilians were also killed and two others wounded in a roadside bombing on the outskirts of Nabatiya township, north of the security zone.

Hizbullah accused Israel of being responsible for the bombing, saying it was the "worst violation by Israel of the [Grapes of Wrath] April understandings."

Lebanese radio stations reported that the Lebanese government is expected to submit a complaint to the Grapes of Wrath monitoring group over the incident.

It was not clear whether Hizbullah would use the civilian casualties as an excuse for Katyusha attacks. Hizbullah leaders have threatened rocket attacks on Galilee if the organization feels that the monitoring group is "no longer able to protect Lebanese civilians."

According to reports from Lebanon, two construction workers who had been loading rocks onto a truck were killed. The reports said a number of bombs had been hidden in fiberglass moulds designed to look like rocks, and had exploded when the workers touched them. A man and his wife who were in a car nearby were wounded.

Lebanese radio stations quoted Lebanese security sources as saying that they had enough evidence to implicate Israel in the blasts.

ter is expected to be raised at the monitoring group, which is due to meet today to discuss a complaint by Israel over Hizbullah bomb attacks near Marjayoun on Monday, to which four Lebanese civilians and three SLA soldiers were wounded.

The IAF struck at Hizbullah targets in the Jezzeine region, north of the security zone. The IDF Spokesman said the pilots reported direct hits and that all the planes returned safely to base.

There was further fighting in the afternoon with gunmen firing anti-tank missiles and light weapons at SLA troops on patrol. An SLA outpost in the area also came under fire. There were no casualties.

Fighting was reported later in the evening in the Kantara region, in the central sector of the security zone. According to reports from Lebanon, a Hizbullah gunman was killed and others may have been wounded.

Hebron sewage could aggravate mosquito problem

By LIAT COLLINS

The problem of mosquitoes in the South could be particularly serious this summer, because of the untreated sewage flowing from Hebron, Environment Ministry Director-General Nehama Ronen has warned.

The areas expected to be worst hit include those bordering the Hebron wadi, Meitar, Omer, and the Beduin villages of the Ab-Kaf tribe. Ronen is calling for the supply of water to Hebron to be made conditional on the appropriate treatment of sewage.

The problem is expected to be worse this year than in the past, according to Ronen, because a large number of sawmills have been established in the areas along the Hebron wadi under Palestinian Authority control. They produce great quantities of untreated wastewater which flows directly into the stream. Environmentalists also predict that the wadi will have flowing water most of this summer, worsening the problem.

In the past, residents have been so plagued by mosquitoes that Jews and Arabs got together to hold joint protests.

Ronen noted that the ministry does not have the authority to take action to force the Hebron Municipality to treat its wastewater and said the matter must be dealt with at the highest government levels.

Ronen said the Hebron Municipality is deliberately not operating the sewage treatment plant, established with civil administration funding, for political reasons, "and therefore there is no alternative but to make the continued water supply to the town conditional on its treatment of the wastewater."

"The Palestinian Authority is responsible for dealing with the problem under the interim agreement, but as with other environmental issues, it is not cooperating and continues to create serious environmental hazards," Ronen said.

Samaria council to sell 900 housing units

By MARGOT DUDKEVITCH

The Samaria Regional Council is planning to offer 900 houses and apartments for sale in settlements throughout the region. The effort is to be preceded by a huge advertising campaign, due to start in the next few weeks.

Council spokeswoman Ahuva Shilo said yesterday the council has received hundreds of calls from people wishing to live in the area. Many of the houses on offer, Shilo says, were built before 1992 and have been standing empty since.

"In 1992, under the former government, a construction freeze was clamped down on Judea and Samaria. Now we have received permission to sell those houses," she said.

Some settlements which have been recently sold houses include Shavei Shomron, Yafir, Ganim, and Kadim. Those in the latter, Shilo said, were sold despite the fact that the two settlements are considered problematic due to their proximity to the Palestinian-controlled Jenin.

The 160-family settlement Barkan is planning to sell 45 "build your own house" units, said Shilo, who noted "The outline plan for Barkan includes the future addition of several hundred more families." The settlement is near the regional council industrial area, which has 100 factories and currently employs 4,500 workers.

Peace Now secretary-general Mosi Raz says that recently building permits were granted to many settlements, including 1,800 in Kiryat Sefer, 1,500 in Ma'aleh Adumim, 1,200 in Emanuel, and 70 in Karmei Shomron. In addition, Raz said, final approval will be granted to thousands more in the next few months. However, Raz said, settlements such as Eli and Shilo have been unable to sell houses that they have built.

Despite the construction freeze under the former government, the regional population sprouted from 9,000 to 13,700. Shilo said, adding that the regional council constantly receives queries from people seeking a higher standard of life, including good educational facilities and a house on a plot of land.

Six weeks ago, said Shilo, regional council members returned from a trip to the US, where they met with potential new immigrants and spoke about moving to Samaria. The group included the head of the absorption center in Shavei Shomron, Baruch Lior.

"The majority of those who make aliyah from the US are religious and we offered them the option of moving to Samaria and purchasing a house on a plot of land," she said.

Council leaders were pleased to discover that during their trip, which took them to New York, Los Angeles, and Chicago, many of the Jews they met with responded positively.

"Until now these people hadn't been informed of Samaria by the aliyah emissaries there," she said. Shilo added that, instead of questions regarding the political and security situation, the council leaders were surprised that the main question potential immigrants asked was the price of a house or apartment. Since their return, two families they met in the US have moved to Karmei Shomron. In addition, a Russian youth whom the group met in Chicago is now attending the ulpan at Shavei Shomron.

Colombian President Ernesto Samper visits the Western Wall yesterday.

Colombian leader's visit displeases US

By MICHAL YUDELMAN, HILLEL KUTTLER and STEVE RODAN

Colombian President Ernesto Samper's visit here is arousing displeasure in the United States, where he is suspected of being linked to drug trafficking, diplomatic sources say. Samper, who is also the president of the Non-Aligned Nations, met yesterday with President Weizman and Foreign Minister David Levy, and today is to meet with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Samper is persona non grata in the US, which has forbidden his entry. He is suspected by the Clinton administration of having ties with drug barons and Colombia's attorney-general has accused him of financing his election campaign with funds from the drug cartel.

While the US has not made any official statement to Israel concerning Samper, Israel Radio reported yesterday that last week a representative of the American Embassy presented the Foreign Ministry with a list of crimes Samper is suspected of.

At his meeting with Levy, Samper offered to contribute to building an atmosphere of trust between Israel and the Palestinians, saying that stopping the peace process only serves the terrorists and the most important thing is not to allow violence or terrorism to stop the talks.

The State Department indicated the US attitude toward Samper is well known. "I'd say it's obviously up to any country to make its own decisions," said Sherman Hinson of the department's bureau of international narcotics and law enforcement.

"In our case, we've declared Ernesto Samper ineligible for a US visa, because we have evidence he received campaign contributions from drug traffickers. But it's up to other countries to make of that what they will."

Every year since 1986, Colombia has been cited by the State Department as a country involved in drug producing and trafficking. For the past two years, it has also failed to receive a presidential waiver given to countries judged to be making a real effort to combat the problem. About one-fourth of all cocaine consumed in the US comes from Colombia, Hinson said.

Meanwhile, Samper was urged yesterday by Israel Aircraft Industries executives to confirm within the next few days a slot in space for a satellite Israel hopes to launch. Colombia has until Saturday to confirm the slot it has reserved with the International Telecommunications Union (ITU) since 1992. The reservation is crucial for Israel's plans to launch a telecommunications satellite for Colombia and four other South American nations within the next three years.

Arab local councils hold one-day strike

By DAVID RUDGE

Tens of thousands of Israeli Arab schoolchildren missed classes yesterday because of a one-day warning strike called by Arab local council heads.

Municipal services in Arab towns and villages throughout the country were also shut down as part of the protest against the financial plight of the debt-ridden local authorities.

Council leaders accused the government of failing to honor an agreement reached in January, after a lengthy protest campaign, to increase the regular and development budgets of the 53 Arab councils.

Hussein Suleiman, spokesman for the forum of Arab Council Heads, said the decision to stage the 24-hour warning strike of municipalities and the education service was made at a meeting of the forum in Shifaram on Saturday.

Suleiman, who is also head of Mash'had local council near Nazareth, said further protest measures were planned unless the government immediately implemented the January agreement. The measures include calling an indefinite general strike of the entire Arab sector, as well as mass demonstrations.

The monitoring committee of the Israeli Arab leadership, which includes the forum of council heads, Arab MKs and public figures, is to meet next Tuesday, immediately after Independence Day, to decide on the further steps in the protest campaign.

Suleiman said the Arab councils had debts totalling NIS 450 million and more than 30 had been unable to pay the salaries of employees - some of them for several months.

"Under the agreement reached in January, the government promised that the councils would be given NIS 40m. this year for development projects and an additional NIS 160m. on regular budgets, spread over three years," said Suleiman.

"It was also agreed that a committee would look into ways of consolidating the deficits of the councils and make recommendations. So far, nothing has transpired from all of these promises which appear to be as worthless as the paper they were written on," he added.

Matza wants end to Treasury 'interference'

By JUDY SEGEL

Health Minister Yehoshua Matza demanded yesterday that Finance Minister Dan Meridor "call his staff to order, and not allow bureaucrats to direct the policy of the government."

Matza, who is in Geneva to attend the World Health Assembly, was referring to statements by Treasury budgets chief David Milgrom, who on Monday advocated nationalizing the health system and/or cutting back on health services.

Matza, using harsh words and referring to bureaucrats as "Treasury boys," accused them of trying to bring the health system to the edge of catastrophe.

"We agreed to set up joint teams for a package deal in the field of health, and suddenly Treasury clerks stand up and present themselves as policymakers," Matza declared. He added that the national health insurance law required certain amendments, "but not before the basket of health services is updated to include new technologies and drugs, as well as keep up with demographics and aging. I call on all who care about the health system to remember this and not to make damaging and baseless declarations," Matza said.

Meanwhile, the Israel Pensioners Association has declared that it would launch a struggle against attempts to cut back on health services.

Gideon Ben-Yisrael, the association's chairman, said that senior citizens use 4.5 times more health services than younger people. Only those with a guaranteed income allotment get a discount on medicines, he said. Cuts in the basket of health services will first and foremost harm the elderly, who cannot bear the extra expense that the Treasury wants to foist on the public, he added.

1st International conference on Jewish adult education to be held this winter

By Jerusalem Post Staff

Jewish educators are expected to converge on Jerusalem this winter for the First International Conference on Jewish Adult Education, the Jewish Agency's Joint Authority for Jewish-Zionist Education announced yesterday.

"Jewish education is a multi-disciplinary, multi-stream, life-long challenge," said Jewish Agency Chairman Avraham Burg. "Jewishly educated adults also become the Jewish educators and role models for their children, ensuring generations of more informed, more affiliated and more involved Jews worldwide," he added.

The conference, to take place from December 28-31, is designed for experts in formal or informal adult Jewish education, including teachers, academics, organizers or administrators. The gathering will focus on religious Jewish education, Hebrew studies, Zionist education, parenthood and Jewish community, and Israeli history, among other subjects. Participants are expected from as far away as Australia and Brazil, and there will also be representatives from Hungary, the former Soviet Union, England and Hungary.

"Many experts deal with adult Jewish education throughout the world," said Shaul Lilach, director-general of the authority's Department for Jewish Education and Culture in the Diaspora. "Yet they have never met as an international group to discuss the professional aspects of their work and how to improve and coordinate Jewish education for adults."

Those interested in attending the conference, to be conducted in English and Hebrew, should contact Leticia Benabou at the authority's Jerusalem office, 02-675-9408, or fax 675-9210. The E-mail address is laecia@jazo.or.il

Jordanian envoy: No water, no talks

By STEVE RODAN

Jordanian Ambassador Omar Rifai, dismissing assertions of a crisis in relations, said yesterday he does not foresee more high-level meetings to discuss the water issue until Israel begins to honor its commitment to provide 100 million cubic meters to his country.

Rifai said the peace treaty stipulated that the water issue be resolved within a year after its October 1994 signing. The treaty called for an immediate 50 million cu.m. of water to Jordan for irrigation, something which Israel honored, as well as an additional 100 million cu.m. through internationally-funded projects.

Omar Rifai (David Rubinger)

"The water issue is not new," Rifai said. "We are in May 1997. We have been talking of the water problem for a year and a half, and we are still at the same point. We have a problem. There are 100 million cu.m. of water still missing."

Israeli diplomatic sources said the heart of the dispute has been Jordan's demand for an immediate transfer of 50 million cu.m. which was to have been obtained by the construction of two dams in Jordan, but neither country succeeded in attracting the international funding required for the project.

Jordanian officials said the treaty does not link the international funding for the dams to Israel's commitment to provide the water. Israeli officials disagree.

Rifai said two meetings were to have taken place yesterday, one of which was meant to discuss bilateral issues, including water. He said he did not know of a meeting scheduled for yesterday between National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon and Jordanian Water and Irrigation Minister Munther Haddadin in Amman.

Regardless, Rifai said he did not foresee more meetings between the ministers until Israel agrees to transfer more water.

"There is a problem here with the water and it seems the solution is in Israeli hands," he said. "When the Israelis say fine, we can have more [meetings]. The meetings are not the issue. We've been meeting for a year. So do we want another meeting? It's not a crisis. But we have this water issue."

Rifai stressed that the decision to cancel yesterday's ceremony at Naharayim for the seven Bet Shemesh schoolgirls killed by a Jordanian soldier in March was Israel's. He said that, in contrast to Israel's assertions, Jordan had never said Crown Prince Hassan would attend the ceremony.

"There was a declaration that Jordan would attend the ceremony, but at what level was not stated," he said. "Last night, I informed the Israelis that the crown prince would not be attending and wanted to talk about who would be sent. The Israeli response was to cancel the whole thing."

Ceremony cancellation shocks, angers Beit Shemesh

By ALLISON KAPLAN SOMMER

Teenage girls in white blouses and long black skirts stood in the early-morning light of Bet Shemesh yesterday and listened disbelievingly to the news their teachers delivered. After steeling themselves psychologically to return to Naharayim, where a Jordanian soldier shot down seven of their friends and classmates less than two months ago, they learned that the trip had been cancelled.

It was as if the young students of the Amit-Fuerst School were victims once more, this time of the vagaries of Middle East diplomacy. Students, teachers, and school officials were baffled and angered at the cancellation of the entire memorial ceremony. The day was to have had several parts - in the morning, the dedication of a hill of flowers in memory of the victims, then planting of trees in their memory, in which the key participants were the families of the murdered girls. Only later, in the afternoon, was a meeting between Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu and Crown Prince Hassan planned.

But at 2:30 a.m. yesterday, school officials and the families of the Naharayim victims received phone calls telling them that the entire day's events would not take place.

"Last night, I sat down with the Jordanians, the police, the General Security Service, and we discussed and planned every detail," said administrative head Haim Rachman. "We decided how the ceremony would go; what songs would be sung, where ambulances would be.

"And what is really odd is that we even discussed how the day would be run should Binyamin Netanyahu and Prince Hassan cancel their participation: the plan was that the events would go on and be attended by local Israeli and Jordanian officials. Cancelling the whole thing this way was a crying shame for the girls, and it's worse for the victims' families."

Indeed, it was the families of the victims who were the most devastated by the decision. Shimon Cohen, the father of Keren Cohen, said he was extremely angry that his personal tragedy in being mixed up with politics, and was not assuaged by assurances that the dedication of the memorials had simply been postponed.

"Whose event was this? Bibi's? Hassan's?" asked Cohen with quiet fury. "Was it their ceremony or our ceremony? I think it belonged to us. How can they inform people who have been through what we have been through by calling us at 2:30 in the morning? Why do we need the Jordanians to memorialize our daughters? We should have had our ceremony on our side of the island without them."

A glance at the hallways and classrooms of the school shows that the pain of the tragedy is still fresh. At the entrance to the school stands a memorial to the seven girls, and in every classroom, bulletin boards are covered with construction-paper memorial candles and poems written by students to express their grief.

Teachers and counselors who had worked hard over the past month and a half to help their students deal with the tragedy - coping with the nightmares and traumatic memories of those who watched their friends die before their eyes - said that yesterday was a setback.

"The girls came back from Pessah break so much more relaxed, as if they had started to put what happened behind them and get back to their studies," said Rosa Himi, who had been on the Naharayim trip. "But then we had to work to help them prepare for this day in Naharayim, and today the frustration of the cancellation. None of it does them any good."

Himi said it would be impossible to teach classes as usual, and that her students would go visit the homes of one of the girls killed.

Counselor Esti Gross stood patiently with group after group of girls and tried to explain to them what had happened. "Israel and Jordan had a disagreement over who should get how much water and, because of these fights, the ceremony was cancelled," she told them.

They looked back at her suspiciously: Many didn't believe her; they were certain that the event was off because of the threat of another terrorist incident.

Some of the girls had mixed feelings about the cancellation. "In a way, it's good, it's a relief," said Pnina Zino, one of the participants on the tragic Naharayim trip. "Our parents were so worried about our going back there, and we were frightened, too. But on the other hand, we were all looking forward to going and feeling close to the memory of our friends who were killed."

Hussein cancels Technion visit

By DAVID RUDGE

King Hussein of Jordan has canceled a scheduled visit to the Technion in Haifa next month to receive an honorary doctorate because the timing of the ceremony is unsuitable, the Technion said in a statement yesterday, after having been notified of the change by Jordan's ambassador to Israel.

However, the ambassador noted that the king would be pleased to accept the title at his palace in Amman or at the Technion at a later time, according to the statement.

The announcement followed the cancellation of a meeting at Naharayim yesterday between Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu and Crown Prince Hassan.

King Hussein was informed of the award at least a month ago, and at the time accepted the invitation for the presentation, which was scheduled to take place at the international board of governors' meeting at the beginning of June.

The Technion decided to award the king the honorary doctorate in recognition of his leadership and commitment to peace in the Middle East.

The board of governors' meeting will go ahead as planned.

Technion spokesman Amir Zmora said the university was "disappointed and sorry" about the cancellation and would check the possibility of "conducting the award ceremony at the Technion at a later date that would be suitable for the king."

Ex-senior police officer, Bella Weinstock released on bail in London

By RAINE MARCUS

Retired police deputy commander Bella Weinstock, who was arrested for attempted fraud in London two weeks ago, was released on $160,000 bail yesterday. Bail had been set last week, but until yesterday Weinstock was unable to obtain the money.

Police allege that Weinstock, who retired from the police force three years ago, attempted to defraud

British tycoon Sir Rocco Forte out of $10 million. She was arrested with an Israeli/Ukrainian citizen and a number of South Americans when Forte filed a complaint to police over the alleged fraud attempt. The South Americans were later released.

Weinstock, 52, has protested her innocence, saying there was a misunderstanding and that she was working on behalf of a foreign company, which she would not name. During her career in the police force, Weinstock, who for a time was a judge in the police disciplinary courts, made many enemies because of her relentless attitude in cracking down on her fellow officers and her battle against irregularities in the force.

Police here were shocked at the news of her arrest, which was kept secret for several days. Weinstock will have to remain in London, as part of her bail conditions, until her trial.

Nomination of tobacco exec as NY's UJA/Federation head draws fire

By JUDY SIEGEL and MARILYN HENRY

The United Jewish Appeal/Federation of New York has been bombarded with protests against its plans to name James Tisch, president of P. Lorillard - one of the largest tobacco companies in the US - as its president.

Alan Jaffe, chairman of the nominating committee, and UJA executive vice president Stephen Solender, have received numerous letters, calls and messages advising the appointment could harm its image and put a damper on donations.

Leading Jewish intellectual Leonard Fein wrote from Boston that he thinks the appointment would be "morally repugnant" because "manufacturers of cigarettes are merchants of death."

Timothy Smith, executive director of New York's Interfaith Center on Corporate Responsibility, protested that "every minute a person smokes snuffs out a minute of that person's life: a slow suicide. We believe that those responsible for the deaths of others violate the Sixth Commandment. Given the on-debatable data about the health hazards of cigarettes, the honoring of a person to serve as the UJA's leader when he is promoting policies and practices that undermine the very health of this country... would be unconscionable."

Rabbi David Saperstein, a prominent anti-smoking activist in Washington, noted that "honoring and legitimizing both tobacco use and the industry that is based on it will implicate the federation in this sweeping debate and tarnish its image."

Solender would not comment directly on the tobacco issue. He did say, however, that "James Tisch has demonstrated a strong commitment to strengthening the Jewish community through many years of dedication to communal service. For more than a decade he has served with distinction in a variety of posts that demanded strong leadership and energy. He represents a new generation of lay leadership and is well qualified to help this organization reach out to younger people..."

"The presidency is not an honorary title, but one that carries enormous responsibility and demands tremendous time and energy. UJA/Federation is fortunate that someone of Jim Tisch's caliber is willing to take on such a role."

WATER

Netanyahu pulled out of the ceremony when it became clear Hassan would not participate. "There was an agreement between us and the Jordanians to delay the ceremony," Netanyahu said, but Jordan denied the meeting between Netanyahu and Hassan had ever been confirmed.

Speaking during a visit at the Tel Nof air base yesterday, Netanyahu said the ceremony could have gone on at a lower diplomatic level, which he did not want. "The memory of the girls who were so brutally massacred there demands a ceremony at the appropriate level, to stress the obligation of Israel and Jordan to ensure that this sort of thing won't recur, and therefore the ceremony will take place in the future."

Hassan telephoned Sharon yesterday to discuss the water controversy, and suggested that Israel and Jordan finance the additional costs holding up the implementation of the water agreement.

Government sources, meanwhile, blamed Egypt for the cancellation of Netanyahu's meeting with Hassan, noting that Egypt has been pressuring Jordan to cool its relations with Israel and to toe the line with the rest of the Arab world. They also said the Jordanians, knowing how eagerly Netanyahu wanted the meeting, tried to squeeze water concessions from Israel. When they realized this would not work, they decided to cancel the meeting.

Agriculture Minister Rafael Eitan did not buy Netanyahu's definition of "a minor crisis," saying: "This is a premeditated antagonistic move by the Arab world, because this current government does not give in like the previous Israeli government did... There is no peace process. The Arabs want to destroy us, as they always did."

Meretz MK Amnon Rubinstein said Hassan should not have cancelled his participation in the ceremony. "No political differences of opinion with Israel can justify canceling the ceremony or the harm caused to the feelings of the bereaved families," he said.

US in last-ditch bid to save Kinshasa

By DIANNA GAHN

LUBUMBASHI (AP) — A US envoy urged Zaire's rebel leader out to take Zaire's capital by force and suggested the creation of a transitional authority to organize elections after President Mobutu Sese Seko's departure.

Bill Richardson, US ambassador to the United Nations, delivered message yesterday in meetings with leader Laurent Kabila and the influential men who have supported his seven-month offensive.

Earlier, in the southeast rebel stronghold of Lubumbashi, Kabila demanded Mobutu immediately transfer power to the rebel alliance "or he perishes with his power."

The World Food Program meanwhile has sent a mission to Congo to prepare for a possible influx of 50,000 refugees massed across the border in Zaire, a spokeswoman said yesterday.

The Rwandan refugees, who fled their own country in 1994 and have been in Zaire ever since, are currently in the northwestern town of Mbandaka, Christiane Berthiaume said citing government and church officials.

"What we have been told is that they are heading towards Congo. They are walking, so we are getting everything ready in case," she said.

Kabila's 70,000-strong rebel army has captured more than three-quarters of Zaire in its drive to end Mobutu's nearly 32-year dictatorship. Kabila said the vanguard of his forces was 65 km from Kinshasa's international airport and would be at the outskirts of the city of 6 million within days.

For weeks, leaflets purportedly from the rebels have told Kinshasa residents that rebel forces were almost there.

Asked what would happen if Mobutu ignored his deadline, Kabila said: "He will be chased from the power, pushed out of Kinshasa in a few days." Richardson talked with Kabila for an hour and said he was encouraged by Kabila's conciliatory tone toward Mobutu. The former New Mexico congressman — who built a reputation for concluding tricky negotiations in North Korea and Sudan — said he delivered an urgent message to Kabila from US President Bill Clinton.

"We stressed our longstanding view that for the benefit of the Zairian people ... there should be a peaceful entry into the capital of Kinshasa — a soft landing which avoids violence and chaos," Richardson said.

After meeting with Kabila, Richardson headed to Botswana to speak with Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni, who was attending a conference in the southern African country.

He met in Kigali, Rwanda, on Sunday with Defense Minister Paul Kagame.

Both men, whom Richardson referred to as "big players" in the Zaire conflict, are widely believed to back Kabila with troops and weapons.

They are interested in seeing Mobutu fall because he backed the former militant Hutu regime in Rwanda that was behind the slaughter of a half-million Tutsis in 1994. Museveni is from the small group of Bahima people in western Uganda, who are related to the Tutsis.

Mobutu and Kabila apparently made little progress toward ending the seven-month war in talks Sunday aboard a South African naval ship docked in Pointe Noire, Congo. They agreed only to meet again within 10 days.

Russia hopes for deal with NATO

BRUSSELS (AP) — NATO and Russia return to the bargaining table yesterday for what Russia's foreign minister says may be the final negotiations on an agreement outlining a new relationship between Moscow and the alliance.

Meeting in Luxembourg, the tiniest member of the alliance, NATO Secretary General Javier Solana and the Russian Foreign Minister Yevgeny Primakov will try to work out the remaining details of a new NATO-Russia document. The Russians say they would like to sign the agreement at a May 27 ceremony in Paris.

NATO, for its part, is less confident that yesterday's negotiating session will be the last. But both sides reported they were getting closer to agreement after five meetings.

NATO wants to complete the deal before its July 8-9 summit in Madrid, Spain, where it will name the first new members from Central and Eastern Europe. Poland, Hungary and the Czech Republic are believed to be the leading candidates.

"I very much want my meeting tomorrow with NATO Secretary General Javier Solana to be the final one in the negotiating process to work out an agreement between Russia and NATO," Primakov told reporters in Strasbourg, France. "One can say the moment of truth will come tomorrow." NATO officials said, however, that though progress has been made, substantial differences remain on the military aspects of the agreement.

"It doesn't look, from our point of view, that this meeting will be the last," said one official, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "Hopefully, it will be a decisive meeting. But we will have to meet again even in the best of scenarios." Most aspects of the document have been agreed, including the creation of a new Russia-NATO council which will allow Moscow to have a direct voice — but not a vote — in NATO decisions.

Unresolved, however, are Russian fears that NATO's move into Central and Eastern Europe poses a military threat. NATO has said it has "no plan, no need and no intention" to move nuclear weapons or combat troops on to the territories of new members, but it will not definitively rule out such a move if future circumstances warrant it.

Moscow wants stronger assurances.

Separate negotiations in Vienna, Austria are revising the treaty on Conventional Forces in Europe, setting out new country-by-country limits on troops and weapons.

another halt in Bre-X trading.

Indonesia, smarting from the Busang scandal, yesterday clamped down on Bre-X by freezing all activities of the Canadian exploration company and its subsidiaries operating in the archipelago.

Mines and Energy Minister Ida Bagus Sudjana said the government would also tighten mining regulations, adding that although the Busang affair had not caused any material loss to Indonesia it had affected the country's image.

"The activities of Bre-X and its subsidiaries operating in Indonesia will be temporarily frozen until investigations are completed," Sudjana told a news conference.

He said agreements in principle granted to Bre-X in 1995 to develop Busang had also been suspended until a probe into discrepancies in the amount of gold at the property estimated by Bre-X and by an independent audit are completed.

Much is at stake for Jakarta in keeping its mining industry free of taint. Latest government data shows Indonesia earned $2.74 billion in 1995 from the export of mining products — excluding oil and gas — such as copper ore to tin and coal, compared with $1.84 billion in 1994.

Export earnings for the products to the first nine months of 1996 amounted to $2.28 billion against $1.94 billion in the same 1995 period.

Bre-X Minerals' shares plummet after gold scam

News agencies

TORONTO — Shares in disgraced Bre-X Minerals plunged to mere pennies yesterday as Indonesia clamped down on the company in the wake of mining's greatest ever scam.

Bitter investors got their first chance to react to news that the company's purported gold bonanza in Indonesia was a fraud and many began preparing lawsuits. Potential partners jumped ship and the Mounties' fraud squad joined the hunt for perpetrators of the scam, which involved doctoring thousands of rock samples over three years.

"This is a top-notch, No. 1, world-class scam," said John Woods, who publishes an investment newsletter in Vancouver. "So many people were fooled for so long."

The price of Bre-X shares opened at six Canadian cents at the Toronto Stock Exchange as trading resumed after a one-day suspension following disclosure of the scam.

The shares, which were worth pennies in 1993, had soared to $280 Canadian dollars each last fall — more than $200 US they had closed Friday at $3.23 Canadian dollars.

A staggering 35.4 million shares — about half the exchange's normal overall daily trading volume — changed hands in the first hour, overloading the computer system and forcing

North Korea, facing famine, hits South for talks failure

SEOUL (Reuters) — North Korea yesterday slammed South Korea for the deadlock in Red Cross talks on food aid but Seoul said it was hopeful future contacts would lead to better ties.

South Korean negotiators returned home yesterday after Red Cross organizations of the two Koreas failed to agree to ways of speeding up southern food aid to the hungry North in their first contacts in nearly five years that ended on Monday in Beijing.

"No agreement was reached at the contact due to the South side's eccentric and incomprehensible attitude," Pyongyang's official Korean Central News Agency (KCNA) said.

"It is empty talk and a sheer waste of time to discuss the procedures and method of the offering with the South side's position remaining unclear," KCNA quoted a spokesman for the North Korean Red Cross as saying.

Seoul's Deputy Prime Minister Kwon O-kiel told parliament the North nevertheless agreed to resume dialogue through a telephone link-up in Panmunjom, the only crossing point in the Demilitarized Zone (DMZ) bisecting the Korean peninsula.

The Beijing talks stalled over the exact amount and method of delivery for South Korean grain to the North, Red Cross officials said.

The South Korean Red Cross had wanted to set up channels for direct delivery of relief supplies. The North sought a promise of an exact aid amount before discussing procedures.

The South also wanted the grain to be moved directly between the two Korean organizations rather than using the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies as a go-between as in past shipments of aid, Seoul officials said.

The North said the talks would resume after the South decided on the amount of food aid it would give but Southern officials said the amount of assistance would depend on how much South Korean citizens were willing to donate.

South Korea's Red Cross is the only window for private food donations from the South to the North, which is sliding into famine after being hit by devastating floods in 1995 and 1996.

Officials report children dying from malnutrition and farmers eating sawdust.

Seoul officials said Red Cross contacts in 1984, arranged to discuss relief supplies after South Korea was hit by floods, had opened an exchange of visits by artists, divided families and officials.

"The government's position is to keep making efforts to promote dialogue with the North," said Lee Ho, South Korea's deputy unification minister.

"We hope contacts between Red Cross organizations will lead to more talks and serve to build up confidence in each other," Lee said.

Kasparov may have folded too soon

NEW YORK (AP) — Garry Kasparov's loss to the IBM computer Deep Blue had chess experts around the world asking each other yesterday: Did the Russian champion give up too easily against the machine?

"I'd say there are hundreds of thousands of people now looking at that possibility," said grandmaster Gabriel Schwartzman, the reigning US Open chess champion who runs Kasparov's official Web site.

"I would love to hear Deep Blue's opinion," Schwartzman said, glancing at the chess-playing computer.

Speculation centers on whether Kasparov was right to quit in the middle of what he considered a hopeless position against Deep Blue.

The alternative was to go for a draw by using his queen to keep the computer's king in perpetual check and force a stalemate, Schwartzman said.

Chess grandmasters all over the world picked up on that possibility, many also using computers for analysis, Schwartzman said. As of yesterday morning, no conclusion was reached, he said.

After defeating the computer Saturday in the opening game of their closely watched six-game match, Kasparov lost Game 2 on Sunday. Game 3 was set for yesterday.

On Saturday, the computer, playing black, resigned after Kasparov's 45th move. But on

Did Garry Kasparov give up too easily? (Reuters)

Sunday, it was Kasparov, playing black, who resigned after Deep Blue's 45th move.

Kasparov, who skipped a post-game news conference, rested and prepared yesterday for the third game against "the creature," as he calls IBM's 1.4-ton chess whiz.

Kasparov's Web site has been hopping with e-mail from chess enthusiasts, Schwartzman said.

After Kasparov's resignation ended game two, one e-mail said, "Don't despair. The machine was created by humans — we can beat it! Don't let it get you down." Another chess fan admonished Kasparov: "Don't be hard on the machine — it's only trying to defend the computer kingdom."

As he braces for another high-tech encounter, Kasparov takes daily strolls in Central Park while his mother, Klara, "takes care of him," Schwartzman said.

Texan separatist shot dead

FORT DAVIS (AP) — Police returned to the air over the rugged Davis Mountains yesterday in a search for a member of the militant Republic of Texas, a day after one of his comrades shot three tracking dogs and then was killed in a shootout.

Both men had disappeared into the mountains hours before other allies of the group ended a week-long standoff with authorities.

The leader of the group, which believes the formerly independent Texas was illegally absorbed by the United States, and several followers were named in a fraud indictment.

The missing man still being sought had been spotted Monday, when authorities scoured the mountains on horseback and by helicopter and with trained dogs.

The two men, 48-year-old Mike Matsoo and 21-year-old Richard Frank Reyes III, had left the Republic's remote headquarters separately.

Republic leader Richard McLareo and his wife, Evelyn, were indicted on charges of defrauding businesses out of hundreds of thousands of dollars with phony money. Several followers also were indicted.

Although officials would not release the name of the man killed, he was described as middle-aged.

"Yeah, that's my brother," said Ralph Matsoo, brother of Mike Matsoo, after being read a description of the victim.

Clinton raises drugs, immigration, in Mexico

MEXICO CITY (AP) — With the thunder of a 21-gun salute, President Ernesto Zedillo and Clinton opened a day of talks yesterday designed to ease festering disagreements between "valued partners and trusted friends."

White House officials said the leaders would approve joint declarations on immigration and drugs, claiming modest progress on two major sticking points in the US-Mexico relationship.

Overlooking the lush, green lawn of the Campo Marte parade ground, Zedillo called Clinton "a good friend to Mexico — a friend who respects Mexico as a sovereign nation." The remarks played to the widespread belief here that US actions on trade and drug trafficking undermine Mexico's national integrity. In a nod to that sense of nationalism, Clinton argued that the United States and Mexico are equal partners — even on the issues of drugs, immigration, trade and human rights that have divided the two nations.

"Let us reach across our common frontier to embrace our tomorrows together — to enter the 21st century as valued partners and trusted friends," he said.

Zedillo and Clinton were joined on stage by their wives, Hillary Rodham Clinton and Nilda Patricia Velasco. They stood as both countries' national anthems were played, and watched from above as cavalry and military academy cadets paraded by, trailed by horse-drawn caissons.

Afterward, the leaders shook hands with dozens of flag-waving youngsters, a few of whom tumbled over rope lines as they stretched for Clinton's hand.

In the crowd watching the ceremony, American Nancy Bein commented, "I thought Zedillo glossed over issues and made everything look peachy." Clinton was more realistic, she added, "but what can you possibly resolve in two days?"

In moment of levity, the commander of the honor guard raced across the camp ground and, in asking permission to start the parade, forgot Clinton's name.

The president laughed about it later. "You see how hard he has to run? I would have forgotten my own name." After all the feel-good rhetoric, the leaders were getting down to work.

A summary of the drug declaration gives the Zedillo and Clinton cabinets until the end of the year to complete a common drug strategy on 16 specific objections — ranging from a crackdown on money laundering to negotiations of an extradition agreement and further cooperation on efforts to stem the flow of illegal firearms across the border.

Japanese visit to disputed islands angers China

BEIJING (Reuters) — China and Taiwan reacted with anger yesterday to a visit by a Japanese nationalist legislator to disputed islands in the East China Sea, while the Japanese government quickly distanced itself from the landing.

Hong Kong activists backing China's claims to the Japanese administered isles pledged to go ahead with plans to sail to the islands from Taiwan with Taiwanese protesters on May 18.

Yesterday's incident, which saw conservative Japanese deputy Sbingo Nishimura and three other people land on the Diaoyu, or Senkaku islands, threatened to rekindle a decades old dispute.

"The illegal landing is a serious violation of China's territorial sovereignty," Foreign Ministry spokesman Shen Guofang said. "The Diaoyu islands have been a part of Chinese territory since ancient times."

Japan, which has claimed the islands between Taiwan and Okinawa since 1895, was quick to distance itself from the landing by Nishimura, a member of the main opposition New Frontier Party.

Prime Minister Ryutaro Hashimoto, clearly displeased, said: "It is well-known that the owner of the land has refused to allow landings there. Do members of parliament have the right to completely ignore that?"

The deterrence triad

The indictment of Nahum Manbar, a businessman and former paratroop officer, for knowingly assisting Iran's chemical weapons program, is so shocking as to be almost unbelievable.

Whatever the court decides, this case and the recent reports of a Russian general's assistance to the Syrian chemical weapons program are wake-up calls regarding the growing non-conventional threats in the region.

The Russian case features one Gen. Anatoly Kuntsevich, who until recently was President Boris Yeltsin's personal adviser on chemical disarmament, and who reportedly played a key role in Syria's development of a new form of nerve agent, called VX. This new nerve agent is considered more dangerous than existing compounds, because it is harder to defend against; it can be absorbed through the skin, so gas masks are largely ineffective against it.

These cases illustrate that nations without the technical know-how to develop the most sophisticated non-conventional weapons can simply pay unscrupulous people to provide what they need. It has often been stated that Iraq, despite the devastating bombardment during the Gulf War and the tightest-ever inspection regime since, retains the most important element of its nuclear program: the know-how to do it again.

When the Soviet Union collapsed, many thought that nuclear weapons would almost immediately find their way to nations such as Iran, with the money and burning desire to become nuclear powers. Even before the Soviet collapse, experts warned for years that the "nuclear club" would grow exponentially as nuclear technology became commonplace. All it took, they said, was a bright physics student and the rest could be found in libraries — and now over the Internet.

As it turns out, non-conventional weaponry has spread much less rapidly than was predicted. Still, the trend is clear, and in one direction. The elaborate web of treaties, customs agents, and intelligence services arrayed to stop the flow of deadly technology to rogue regimes has made a difference, but is fighting a losing battle.

Computers that were once labeled "supercomputers" and could only be exported to certain countries with a round-the-clock guard are now a short time away from being available on every desktop. In any case, most of the US nuclear arsenal was designed on computers that today would fit in a briefcase.

Despite this, there are certain "chokepoint" technologies that are, for good reason, controlled by the West. But most of the painstaking and necessary efforts of the West to put the non-conventional weapons genie back in the bottle can be thwarted by a handful of people willing to sell out to the highest bidder. The battle against proliferation of weapons of mass destruction must be waged, but strategic planners must assume that it will only buy time.

In a sense, much of this battle is already over. Chemical weapons — "the poor man's nuke" — are held by practically all of the world's most aggressive and dangerous regimes. If not now, then soon, lack of capability will not stand between Israel and a massive chemical attack from Iran, Iraq, Syria, or Libya; the playing field has shifted to what strategists call "mutual deterrence." For decades, such a system allowed millions of Russians and Americans to sleep at night with nuclear weapons pointed at their heads. Now Israelis are supposed to rest easy knowing that their undeclared nuclear force stands opposite the chemical weapon-tipped missiles pointed at Israel.

This head-to-head matching of Arab chemical and reported Israeli nuclear weapons was alluded to recently, from the other side, by Syrian President Hafez Assad in Cairo. Assad's charge that Israel had no right to complain about Syria's new VX nerve agent given, he said, Israel's nuclear arsenal, was the most direct juxtaposition of the two forces to date.

Some analysts are so confident in Israel's deterrent capability, that they have even called the joint US-Israeli Arrow missile program a waste — because the Arrow is designed to shoot down missiles that will never be launched. Such talk is incredibly foolhardy. Israel cannot afford to rely completely on the MAD (mutually assured destruction) theory of deterrence that was followed by the United States and the Soviet Union.

Defenses add to deterrence by reducing the likelihood of success of an attack, and are critical to reducing the damage if deterrence fails.

In addition, former prime ministers Shimon Peres and Yitzhak Rabin both argued that the peace process is essentially in a race against the increasing non-conventional capabilities of Israel's enemies. It would be naive to argue that a comprehensive peace between Israel and most of the Arab world would induce the countries that threaten Israel to abandon their quest for the bomb. Iran and Iraq would likely have such programs even if Israel did not exist.

Peres and Rabin were right however, that peace treaties with Arab nations do have a role in Israel's deterrent system against a non-conventional attack. The ability to retaliate massively and to defend against attack are two legs of the triad of deterrence. The third is the pursuit of peace treaties that contribute to making such an attack as unthinkable as possible.

Perceptions of the past

Deir Yassin, the Palestinian village laid waste by dissenting Jewish forces 49 years ago, conjures up some of the darkest and most painful chapters in this country's tragic history of Arab-Jewish conflict and bloodshed.

Physically, the village no longer exists; but it survives in the historical memories of both peoples. To the Palestinians, it is the everlasting symbol of their national tragedy — the scene of wanton bloodshed triggering the mass exodus that culminated in the suffering Arab refugee problem.

For the Israelis, it is the propaganda vehicle used to discredit their military reputation, undermine their political sovereignty and, above all, challenge their morality and national honor.

In anticipation of the incident's 50th anniversary, a group of Palestinians and Jordanians, led by Americans sympathetic to the Deir Yassin victims, wants to erect a memorial at the site dedicated to the 250 villagers killed there. The project was very sensitively described by my good friend and colleague Rami G. Khouri, a distinguished Jordanian journalist, in a recent column in Ha'aretz.

One of Khouri's most salient points was that the memorial's location would be perfect from the standpoint of Arab-Jewish relations because it would be clearly visible from Ya'd Vashem on the other side of an intervening ravine. That is highly debatable; it suggests that the bloodletting at Deir Yassin and the Holocaust were of the same magnitude.

EVEN more troubling, however, is Khouri's account of that fateful day, April 9, 1948, and, above all, its alleged culmination: the transport of 50-odd male survivors through the streets of Jewish

JAY BUSHINSKY

Jerusalem amid a cheering crowd, and their execution "in cold blood" at a local quarry.

That purported episode would classify the Deir Yassin operation, initiated by the militant IZL and Stern Gang, as a crime against humanity on a par with SS captain Erich Priebke's massacre of 335 Italian Jews and partisans in the Ardeatine Caves outside Rome in August, 1944. It might have led to a war crimes trial during or immediately after Israel's struggle for

A Deir Yassin memorial? We cannot object, but we must not let the truth be distorted independence.

But it didn't. Because Khouri's historiography is wrong.

Gabriel Zifroni, the veteran Israeli journalist who was in Jerusalem covering the grisly events at the time, recalls seeing Red Cross trucks carrying the Deir Yassin survivors "to Mandelbaum's house, where the Haganah hid its forward positions, after which they were allowed to cross to the Arab side."

Aharon Amir, the poet, novelist and translator, also in Jerusalem at the time, was in the area of Mahane Yehuda as the trucks passed.

He detected "a degree of relief, if not outright satisfaction, on some people's faces, perhaps because of the preceding slaughters of Palestinian Jews." But Amir dismissed the notion of mass executions in a local quarry as false.

Ironically, Amir translated Dominique Laperrière's and Larry Collins's 'O Jerusalem!' into Hebrew. Their text contains a shocking account of the attack on Deir Yassin, including bestial acts by the Jewish combatants, but makes no mention of the alleged executions.

The succinct and factual version contained in 'Israel, Army and Defense,' a military lexicon by respected Ha'aretz military analyst Ze'ev Schiff and Eitan Haber, prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's former political adviser, tells of a dawn attack by a Jewish force numbering 130 preceded by an unsuccessful effort to notify the villagers to evacuate their homes.

In his memoir entitled 'The Revolt,' Menachem Begin, the IZL's supreme commander, writes that the loudspeaker's message did reach the local "women, children and elderly persons" for whom it was intended; those who heeded it survived. Neither the lexicon nor the memoir refers to the alleged executions.

In any case, the village was taken after a Haganah unit was called in to help secure it.

Reflecting on the tragedy and on the idea of putting up a memorial at the now-nonexistent village site, a Palestinian friend of mine roused the other day, "I think all of us would be better advised to look forward to the future, rather than backward into the past." He attributed the Deir Yassin memorial project to the zeal of the American sympathizers rather than to local Palestinian initiative.

"I see no sense in linking it, even via visual proximity, to the Holocaust," my friend said.

In my opinion, he is right.

Dotty diagnosis

BOB WIEMER

Sick people aren't funny. But some of the rules governing the treatment of the mentally ill in the American workplace are the very stuff of farce.

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which promulgated those rules last month, has been termed a "flak catcher," an employee or agency that absorbs criticism and even vilification, so elected officials can avoid political discomfort.

In this case, the EEOC is getting Congress out of a very uncomfortable position.

The Americans With Disabilities Act of 1990 is an unwieldy mishmash of noble sentiment, high hopes, and cynical accommodation to the notion that euphemism triumphs over all.

Thus, under its definitions, no one is crippled and no one is handicapped in this society. There are only challenged people, who, with a little help, can be just like everyone else.

The Americans With Disabilities Act renders that nice, but sappy, sentiment into law. Congress enacted the law because it was easier than facing the lobbying tactics of the disabled.

Marshaling a mass of twisted bodies on gurnies and in wheelchairs is such an effective technique that the disabled seldom leave Washington without the law they came for. That's why bathroom accommodations and parking spaces for the handicapped far outnumber the people who need them.

In extending this workplace equality to psychotics, Congress magnificently declared it law and left the development of regulations up to the EEOC, thus letting the commission take the blame for the bill drafters' idiocies.

Neurotic rules for workplace neurosis

This is customary. It is also why the bureaucrats who staff such regulatory agencies have such awesome power.

Among the regulations promulgated last week are these: Employers may not ask potential employees if they are mentally ill or if they have a history of mental illness. Nor can they ask employees who are known to be mentally sick if they have been taking their medications.

Nonetheless, employers must make a "reasonable accommodation" to any acute-stage behavior that might pop up on the job.

Thus an employee who is rude to coworkers or comes to work looking dirty or disheveled can't be routinely disciplined provided he or she can convince a therapist that the behavior arises out of any item on a constantly expanding list of mental and emotional diseases.

IN HIS short essay, titled "On the Verge of Dementia Praecox," humorist Robert Benchley feared he was coming down with that malady because one of the symptoms is an inability to concentrate. Benchley confessed that someone could sit on his chest and shout in his face and still not get his attention.

Under EEOC regulations, an employer would be required to make the workplace more accommodating to someone like Benchley by installing soundproofing or erecting partitions or other visual barriers to enhance concentration.

What's more, the regulations forbid the employer from disclosing a worker's mental problems.

So when people who behave strangely are getting what seem to be special perks — including soundproofed, private work spaces, schedule changes, job coaches or time off — other employees are left to take up the slack and wonder about what's going on.

(The EEOC would like us to believe that such discretion is necessary to protect the sick workers. That's not the only consideration: Once the word gets out that sickness brings perks, everybody will be running off to therapists to get a positive diagnosis of dottiness.)

The workplace trend toward using independent contractors and casual part-timers can only be exacerbated by these regulations. Where's the fairness in that?

And just where will the EEOC and the courts draw the line on public safety? Will melancholy pilots or bus drivers be allowed to work? And if not, what about suicidal trailer-truck drivers?

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

DR. QADI

Sir, — As a medical practitioner on a short visit to study medical services in Jerusalem and the West Bank, I was shocked to read that my colleague, Dr. Samir Qadi, the director of the Ahli Hospital in Hebron, had been arrested for masterminding an Arab terror squad that has murdered 11 people.

It would seem to me that the international medical and human-rights community should demand an immediate condemnation for Dr. Qadi, who, contrary to his Hippocratic oath, has taken lives instead of saving them.

ANIMAL FARM

Sir, — It was almost with a sense of awe that I listened to MK Uzi Landau on the radio, while he whined that "everyone" was out to get Prime Minister Netanyahu's government. To hear him talk, the list of evil persecutors, including the police, the judiciary, the news media, radio and television, half the Knesset, and the devil knows who else, is so long it's amazing there's anyone left who isn't.

I think that this sordid business should initiate a movement towards more responsible government in Israel, a system in which the undemocratic immunities which MKs and government officials have so brazenly arrogated to themselves are eliminated completely.

SHULAMIT ADLER

Sir, — Shulamit Aloni's new book, 'Couldn't Do It Differently' (April 10), reminded me of the days when she taught Hebrew in the 1950s at my old school, Whittinghame College in Brighton, England.

Whittinghame College was then a famous all-Jewish boys school, with excellent secular studies. But its teaching of Judaism was nonexistent, and most of its pupils subsequently married out. Shulamit Aloni (then Shulamit Adler), who was famed even then as a forceful advocate for a de-judaized extreme leftist secularism of the highest degree, found a comfortable niche under the school's headmaster, Jacob Halevi, the famous Israeli educator.

Even in those early days of the State of Israel she was disliked by many of the Israeli boys for her overtly anti-Zionist, pro-Arab stance.

CONVERSION

Sir, — Lisa Rubin (Letters, April 17) lashes out at Israeli law for not recognizing her as a Jew. She should reserve her anger for the Reform authorities which led her through a conversion they knew would be unacceptable. No matter how Jewish she feels, no matter how many Friday night services she attends, neither in Israel nor in America can her children marry a Jew in a traditional Orthodox ceremony. Thus a pernicious division has been created.

If she really is interested in being considered Jewish, the procedure for her to follow is straightforward.

PRAYER FOR UNITY

Sir, — I recently received a call from several of my rabbinic colleagues at the Rabbinical Assembly Convention in Boston. A number of Conservative rabbis feel that it would be appropriate to recite at the Seder a prayer for the unity of the Jewish people. They are urging all rabbis and members of Conservative, Reform, Orthodox and Reconstructionist congregations to do so.

A prayer for this effect will be recited at yahrzeit after the matza is broken. Our Seder meal will not conclude until the missing piece of matza is found and brought back to the table. The matza, when restored, demonstrates the desire of our people to be one people together in peace.

ANTI-LITTER LAW

Sir, — The new anti-litter law is an important step forward, if it is enforced. That is the big question. Here in Rehovot, for example, there are numerous places with large signs proclaiming that the deposit of litter is prohibited and that violators of this regulation will be prosecuted. But nowhere will you find so much litter as in the area adjacent to the signs.

Not a single person, however, has ever been prosecuted for this offense. The same "immunity" also exists for those who illegally paste up their posters on every wall and bus shelter in town. No action is taken against them, even when it is patently clear — as is the case with the Habad Messiah posters — which organization is responsible for the violation.

Let us hope that the new law is enforced more vigorously, starting, perhaps, in Rehovot.

they would have been foolish to miss. Moreover, the Arabs are aware of the dangers inherent in the resort to force.

However, the fear among Arabs that Israel has blocked progress through political channels and put obstacles in the Arabs' way to realizing those components of the agreement that they desire really makes their choice less than genuine.

IT IS Israel's prerogative to continue along this path, but it should not delude itself that it will be able, concurrently, to follow the diplomatic route.

and stress that they must plan — right up to the front line — for the coming challenge.

Israel should act immediately to improve its military readiness. This clearly affects both the defense budget and its distribution. The need to raise the level of preparation and drilling by combat units in all branches of the military will have repercussions on the size of the reserve call-up this coming year, and on how it is utilized.

All crucial combat equipment must immediately be supplied; ammunition stores must be replenished and spare parts restocked. At the same time, the utmost must be done to prepare the home front for anticipated missile attacks, for attacks using conventional warheads, and even — heaven forbid — for chemical and biological attacks.

These preparations in anticipation of a possible violent confrontation are clearly and primarily required to rout the enemy, should battle be imposed on us. But these preparations — and there is no question that the Arab side will see what we are up to — may also serve to deter the other side and actually prevent hostilities with an Arab side already wavering over the military option.

Israel has changed political course, but it has not yet begun to take the next, preparatory steps. What we need now is an open and courageous assessment of the situation; the necessary measures will follow as a result. In the end, only he who plans well for war may prevent war.

THE MOST politically incorrect thing to do in Israel is to arrive on time. At least one of the guests invited last week to the Onix pub in Jaffa to celebrate the birthday of Anne Pollard, ex-wife of convicted US spy for Israel Jonathan Pollard, came at the stated starting time only to discover that neither the hostess nor any of the other guests had arrived. The party finally got underway close to the witching hour and continued till day-break.

SUCH A refreshing change to have a non-government scandal. The disposal of the estate of tycoon Shoul Eisenberg who died in March is the sort of stuff that soap operas are made of, and the Hebrew media is having a real field day speculating whether his disinherited daughter Esther Zochovitsky will sue for her share or not. So far, she says that she doesn't want to do anything to besmirch her father's memory, and may not do anything at all. It all depends on the advice she gets from her lawyer Yigal Arnon.

Meanwhile Esther's mother Leah Eisenberg, who has accused her son of trying to obliterate his father's memory, has no such reservations and has asked her lawyer Jacob Weinroth, who recently represented Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in the Bar-On Affair, to appeal to the court to award her half of the estate in accordance with Israeli law. Under the terms of a copy of a will dated 1986, the multi-millionaire's main beneficiary is his son Erwin who will not only receive 80 per cent of the estate but is also one of four executors of the will. The other three executors are lawyers - one British, one Swiss and one Israeli, namely Ram Caspi. Erwin Eisenberg's lawyer is former Justice Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman.

Journey into the past: Filmmaker Gregori Viens in Rhodes shooting a documentary on the 'Island of Roses.'

Beaches and balads from Rhodes to LA

Jewish immigrants from Rhodes have made a second home off the shores of Los Angeles. A new film documents their history, Tom Tugend reports

Every summer, more than 100 Jewish immigrants from Rhodes, accompanied by their Los Angeles-born children and grandchildren, make the ferry to the island of Catalina, off the coast of Los Angeles.

There they frolic on the beaches and feast on the home-baked delicacies of their ancestral Mediterranean island. The outing is like a voyage into the past, says Mati Franco. "With its hills, beaches and small towns, Catalina is a lot like Rhodes."

Even in the melting pot of America, the Rhodesis (as they are known) cling and revel in their Sephardi heritage and the memories of Rhodes, transmitting them to their children and children's children.

"Life in Rhodes was charming, with a lot of freedom and joy. Ninety percent of the songs were love balads and the culture was very Mediterranean," says Franco, whose mother, Rebecca Amato Levy, virtually serves as an institutional memory of what was once the small but thriving Jewish community on the Greek island off the Turkish coast.

The 85-year-old Levy is a central figure in a striking documentary film produced and directed by her grandson, Gregori Viens, and titled Island of Roses: The Jews of Rhodes in Los Angeles. The first Jews settled in Rhodes centuries before the common era and their presence is mentioned in ancient Roman documents. In the early 16th century, Jews expelled from Spain in 1492 arrived and soon absorbed the earlier Greek-speaking Jewish inhabitants into their culture and language.

In the years before World War I, the number of Jews peaked at 5,000 (among a total population of 75,000) and supported six synagogues. When Italy replaced the Ottoman Empire as the ruling power on Rhodes in 1912, and with the outbreak of World War I, more than half the Jewish community emigrated to South Africa, Latin America and the United States.

The remaining 2,000 Jews managed to hold on during the first years of World War II under relatively benign Italian rule. But in 1944, Hitler's army took over and in one day shipped the entire community to Auschwitz. Only 170 survived.

During the first two decades of this century, Jewish emigrants from Rhodes established close-knit communities on the east and west coasts of the US, and today there are an estimated 10,000 Rhodesis and their descendants in America. Of these, around 4,000-5,000 live in New York, 3,000 in Los Angeles, 1,500 in Atlanta and 1,000 in Seattle. A distinguished member of the New York community is Rabbi Marc Angel, president of the Union of Sephardic Congregations and spiritual leader of the famous Spanish-Portuguese Synagogue.

The Rhodesis of Los Angeles tend to stick together, geographically and socially. Mati Franco, whose Hebrew name is Mazal Tov, says most of her friends are from the Rhodes community, but the ties go beyond friendship.

"All of us from Rhodes are related to each other, we are all close or distant relatives," she says. "If you come to one of our meetings or celebrations, everyone is hugging and kissing each other." Among the younger Rhodesis, marriages with Ashkenazi spouses are becoming more common, but it wasn't always that way.

Franco remembers her father-in-law talking about his youthful courtship of an Ashkenazi girl. "Her family wouldn't accept him as a Jew because he spoke Ladino instead of Yiddish and didn't like matza-ball soup," she recounts.

"It was only when he asked for a prayer book and read from it in Hebrew that her family was reluctantly convinced. By that time, my father-in-law was so disgusted that he dropped the girl."

Asked whether Sephardim, who were the first Jews to settle in North America and were the early

"grandees" of the Jewish community, felt a sense of superiority toward the Ashkenazi newcomers, Franco responded: "No, I've never encountered that. However we at times feel under-appreciated for our contributions to Jewish religion and culture." Ladino, or Judeo-Spanish, continues to play a role in the lives of the first and second generations of Rhodesis immigrants and is used in synagogue services, alongside Hebrew and English.

Indeed, the family matriarch Rebecca Amato Levy, like other Rhodes-born immigrants, is multilingual, reflecting the different eras in the history of her native island.

"My mother speaks Greek, Turkish, Italian, Ladino, Hebrew and English," notes Franco. Levy is the author, in Ladino, of the book I Remember Rhodes. This polyglot background is reflected in the Island of Roses documentary, where interviewees respond occasionally in Ladino or French.

Franco, who served as the film's co-producer with her son Gregori, recounts that he initially started the project as an oral history of his grandmother. It evolved into a "glorified home movie" and ended up as a professional 55-minute documentary, which has won a number of film awards.

Rebecca Amato Levy, 85-year-old grandmother of the filmmaker, is a living history of the Jews of Rhodes.

By Sam Orbaum

It was over when the fat lady cried. Miss Fat Israel was crowned on Saturday night in Beersheba in a beauty contest of epic proportions. The 20 finalists came in all shapes and sizes: large, larger, zaftig.

How do you get in shape for a contest like this? You guessed it: "I ate," laughed Anat Perez, who didn't chow down enough to make the final five.

A buffet table, set up backstage for the girls, was picked clean. Mind you, they didn't nibble on carrot sticks or peck at lettuce leaves: this was a full-force pig-out - a vat of cholent, halla, mounds of cake and salads heavy on the mayo.

"The stress here is fat," said Yebudit Karman, a wide 30-year-old blonde. "Beauty is secondary. As you can see, fatties can be pretty."

"What you see here is the antithesis of classical beauty," said Daniella Shamgar with admirable diplomacy, considering her foxxy figure.

This woman had a lot of nerve coming here: Shamgar, who made aliyah five years ago, was Miss Holland in 1987, and still looks it.

Shamgar was one of the 17 judges. Yeah, 17. (They could have downsized the jury to just one, me. I picked the winner the moment I laid eyes on her.) The panel included the requisite officials from sponsoring companies, lawyers, local dignitaries, my gut I knew that beauty was not only for the thin. As I see it, beautiful women are either fat or thin; nothing in between."

Proud of her discerning eye, she consented to guess the frontrunners: "Iris Gur, Sivanit Silk, Gila Mamo, Ruti Perez, Yafit Ohayon: one of those will win."

As the clock ticked down to the start of the contest, tension gnawed at the contestants. They paced, preened, noshed, joked. Two ladies, worn down by the excitement, yawned. Others practiced their smiles. "Oh, God, I'm so nervous I can feel myself getting thin," Bela Feri moaned.

Anat Perez and Ruti Perez responded to the onstage music with a spirited dance. "What great fun," Anat said to gales of laughter that broke the tension, "two fat ladies dancing together." (The music was naturally selected to theme, but although they did play "I Love You Just the Way You Are," regrettably they chose for the crowning "Isn't She Lovely" rather than the more obvious "Big Girls Don't Cry.")

Ten minutes to showtime. Iris Gur, tall and big-boned rather than plump, announced that: "If I win, I'm going on a crash diet."

A couple of others razzed her, and a skinny flower girl said, with little sincerity, that she wished she were fat.

Ohayon, a sumptuous raven-haired beauty, nodded in the direction of Mamo. "She's going plus actor Ze'ev Revach, celebrated fatty Fanny Rachi (sadly down to 108 kg, from a prod 123) and Miss Israel 1997, Miri Greenberg.

The jumbos on stage had no reason to be envious of Greenberg, who looked ridiculously out of place among them. Greenberg, a sexless waiflike string-bean who looks like a pre-teen, weighs in at 54 kg, almost half the magnitude of one contestant, the very scenic Yafit Ohayon (105 kg).

For many of these lumpy lovelies, winning would be a mere bonus: the real victory was standing on stage, proud and dignified, basking in the applause and soft-whistles of the packed 700-seat Hechal Hatarbut.

Bolstered by each other's support, reveling in their good humor and remarkable warmth, no one here felt shame or humiliation or disgust at being fat.

And while they paraded about in their portly splendor, their husbands, none of them Adonises themselves, had to appreciate them for being precisely what they are.

Fanny Rachi (a name that, you should pardon me, seems to mean "soft tushy") was resplendent in a large, shiny, yellow pantsuit for which there was, apparently not enough material to reach her upper chest. Nevertheless, what she concealed that was of greatest interest to this journalist, was her judgment. "OK, I'll tell you. Number 20 [Miri Levy] is too thin. Number 12 [Ohayon] is gorgeous. Number 14 [Gila Mamo] has personality."

So that none of the paying public should go home disappointed, there was plenty of flesh on show: pupkies and pulkes and cleavage.

But that was entirely the property of five lithe showgirls who punctuated the program with dance numbers ranging from bellydancing to cabaret. (In addition, a man and woman performed some wondrous tumbling acts - with her as the tumbler. The woman freaked out the contestants with incredible contortionist moves, prompting chunky Ohayon to mumble, "Oy, I gotta try that tonight.")

The contestants themselves were modestly dressed. Sorry, guys, no bikinis, no swimsuit competition. They started out with rose-patterned loose frocks, changed into pantsuits and then later, lacy white evening wear. The idea was not to hide the girls, but not to let it all bust out either.

Esterika Nagid, the dynamic impresario who put on this show, described how it came to be. "I organize lots of beauty contests and fashion shows, but always I knew something was amiss. In to win. She's beautiful inside and out", Ohayon, a favorite herself, admitted she didn't want to be fat.

Five minutes to go. Joe Lev, one of the tuxedoed chaperones, evoked fantasies in every woman there. However, the tanned 22-year-old Italian, blessed with wit, charm, intelligence and Romeoesque beauty, was unavailable. "Let's be honest," he said in an undertone. "They're fat." He picked Kalanit Rakovsky - probably the thinnest of them all - to win. "She's the most beautiful. Fat with a figure. But Ruti Perez has the sweetest smile."

Lev said it had been hard to work with them "because they're not professional models. They've never done this before."

Time! An official hurried in. "Alright, ladies, this is it. Everyone shut off your cell phones!"

The ladies marched out on stage and the crowd went nuts. It soon became apparent why: Ruti Perez had filled the hall with her entire hamula - every time she moved, she got a standing ovation. Nobody resented her, though, because she was such a sweetie.

"Ladies and Gentlemen, the five finalists!" Iris Gur, 31, 1.75 tall, green eyes, curly brown hair, a full-bodied beauty.

Fabianna Birendorf, 28, 1.78, big brown eyes, short brown hair, svelte with padding. Gila Mamo, 29, 1.70, dazzling green eyes, red hair, every bit of her huggable.

Ruti Perez, 35, 1.70, crisp blue eyes, blonde hair, ultimate proof that fat people tend to be jolly. Yafit Ohayon, 23, 1.72, exotic brown eyes, a cloud of black hair, a veritable eyeful.

In the end, it was no contest, really: Perez, from nearby Lehavim, brought the house down when she was named Miss Congeniality.

And finally... Miss Fat Israel 1997... Beersheba's own pride and joy... Gila Mamo!

You've never seen anyone so proud as her husband Yehuda. "That's my queen," he said with a broad grin. Their three young sons gawked in astonishment at the fuss surrounding Mommy. "People need meat on them," Yehuda said, and laughed, as he shot a glance at Miri Greenberg. "Nebich."

Gila divulged her 94-kg secret (an exclusive for this reporter): "Pasta. I love pasta. And bread and couscous. Best way to get fat."

Nineteen hefty heartthrobs converged on Gila for a huge hug-in. Behind them, on the stage wall, was a most appropriate tribute: a poster of the most beautiful fatty of them all, Mona Lisa. She was smiling.

A new view of attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD)

By RUTH MASON

Recent research clearly shows that the millions of children diagnosed with Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder (ADHD) probably do not have an attention problem, according to Russell Barkley, Ph.D., a leading ADHD researcher from the University of Massachusetts Medical Center.

Based on several studies and a new theoretical model, Barkley, one of the world's foremost researchers on ADHD, says he now believes these children's main problem is one of inhibition. In other words, he believes they have a hard time stopping before they act. And that's why they hit, scream and curse more than other children their age.

This could be big news for the children who have been diagnosed with the disorder. Far fewer children than originally thought truly have a problem with attention, according to Barkley.

Various studies show that the children with the inhibition problem have difficulty controlling their emotions, programming motor behavior and directing their activity toward a desired goal. They also have difficulty with "internal language" or those words we all say to ourselves in order to control our actions.

"These kids learn little from their experiences," Barkley said. "They have a limited sense of the past, a very different sense of time and are less self-aware than others." Because they live in the moment, they have trouble with homework, chores and getting ready. "They get happy quickly and get mad quickly. They can't inhibit anger even when it gets in the way of a social situation," he said.

The implications for parents: social-skills training or cognitive therapy won't help these children. "Telling these children how to act won't help," Barkley said. "They know how to act, but this knowledge doesn't control them. The moment controls them." The most effective treatment so far, according to Barkley, is a combination of stimulant medication (usually Ritalin) and training parents.

Israel's Samurai bond offer delayed

Israel's first entry into the Japanese Samurai bond market has been delayed. Accountant-General Shai Talmon said yesterday. The delay is attributed to the Japanese Finance Ministry's ongoing investigation into the activities of Nomura Securities Co. Ltd., allegedly guilty of making transactions in breach of the country's Securities and Exchange Law.

If current rumors are true, planned sanctions against Nomura would prevent Israel's bonds from being distributed among institutional investors in an optimal way. Israel wants to draw as much attention as possible to its planned issue and would rather wait until the Nomura scandal has faded, according to Talmon. The issue, in which the Treasury intends raising some 15-20 million yen, is likely to take place later this year. David Harris

Livnat: Reconsider Turbowicz for Bezeq

The requirement of a cooling-off period for senior government officials who want to move into other positions should be reassessed, Communications Minister Limor Livnat said yesterday in asking Attorney-General Elyakim Rubinstein to consider the matter.

Livnat's nominee for Bezeq director-general, Dr. Yoram Turbowicz, was rejected by a judicial cooling-off panel in March unless he waited a year after leaving the Anti-Trust Authority; Turbowicz decided not to appeal the decision, and Ami Erel was appointed instead. Judy Siegel

Israel-Turkey trade expected to double

With the introduction of free trade on May 1, trade volume between Israel and Turkey is expected to double this year, according to Israel-Turkey Business Council chairman Pini Peled.

Bilateral trade totalled $450 million last year, excluding military deals. In the first quarter this year the figure reached $150m. David Harris

Suissa joins municipal demonstrators

Senior officials in the Union of Local Authorities held a protest outside the Prime Minister's Office yesterday as they step up their campaign against planned legislation combating pay excesses in the public sector. Bezeq seeks OK for phone-rate rise

By JUDY SIEGEL

Bezeq intends to ask the Knesset Finance Committee for permission to change its rate structure, raising some charges and lowering others.

The company's new director-general, Ami Erel, told reporters yesterday that when the Knesset returns from spring vacation later this month, Bezeq will ask for a graduated increase in bi-monthly service fees by 7.8% to 47%, depending on the amount of outgoing calls (indefinite users would pay much less).

The charges for local services, excluding the bi-monthly service fee, would increase by 3.1%; domestic calls would be 8.5% cheaper; the cheaper rates would begin at 6 p.m. instead of 8 p.m.; and all intercity rates would have a single rate, rather than cheaper ones from outlying towns.

In addition, Bezeq wants to lower rates for most services between 8 a.m. and 1 p.m. to benefit the commercial sector.

Erel said these structural changes were vital for Bezeq to face competition and simplify rates.

Bezeq officials said this would make Bezeq services the cheapest throughout the day and night compared to rates charged by the cellular phone companies and for international calls.

Heineken-Tempo deal fizzles out

Minority shareholder Podhorzer refuses to renew CEO's buy option

By Jerusalem Post Staff

The ostensibly concluded deal by which Dutch beer giant Heineken was to take over Netanya-based Tempo Beer Industries was dealt a sudden and potentially fatal blow yesterday, when minority shareholder Moshe Podhorzer backtracked from his intention to sell his 45.5 percent stake in the company to chairman Jack Beer and Heineken.

Beer's option to purchase Podhorzer's stake expired Saturday, and Podhorzer's announcement said he would not renew it.

Podhorzer's options agreement was conditional on Heineken's acquisition of control in Tempo. Heineken executives are due to arrive in Israel in the coming days in a bid to re-open negotiations, but Podhorzer stressed he will not reach agreement with them under the present terms.

A number of weeks ago, Heineken and Beer requested a month's extension from Podhorzer to close the details of an arrangement between them.

Podhorzer said from now on he will look to keep the company under domestic control, despite the possibility that a strategic international partner could be of benefit.

The original idea was that once the shares were bought, Tempo would be split into two companies, one of which would focus on the beer market, while the other would deal with non-alcoholic beverages, specifically Pepsi's. Heineken was to control the beer company, which is the source of most of Tempo's earnings.

In February, Podhorzer gave Heineken and Beer an option to acquire his stake in Tempo for $42 million.

The Beer-Bornstein Group, which includes the son of the company's founder, the late Moshe Bornstein, had committed itself to purchasing Podhorzer's shares at the offer price.

Podhorzer made the sale of his shares conditional on them eventually winding up in the hands of Heineken and the Dutch company's holding of at least 50% of the shares in Tempo.

Tempo sources had expressed fear that Tempo's soft drink division would be forced to make major cutbacks after the split-up as a result of the strong competition currently prevailing in the market.

Tempo's major soft drink competitors, Coca Cola and Jafara-Tabori, have managed to increase their share of the market in recent years at the expense of Tempo.

The issue is the latest in a series of rows between Beer, who is married to Bornstein's daughter Rina, and director Moshe Podhorzer, who is married to Bornstein's other daughter, Bilha, and owns a controlling share in mineral-water producer Nevot, which is distributed by Tempo.

When the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange was at an all-time low last summer, Podhorzer decided to take advantage of the situation and acquired 20% of Tempo's stock from provident and mutual funds, increasing his personal stake to 44.5%.

The shares were acquired for a total of NIS 40.2m. One day later, Beer, who felt threatened by Podhorzer's attempts to gain control, purchased an additional 4.5% share of Tempo, increasing his holding to 51%.

The additional shares were purchased at a price 250% above their market value. At this point Heineken threatened to pull out of its existing links with Tempo, but ultimately settled for a hastily-reached compromise which included Podhorzer's option to sell his share in Tempo to the Dutch Heineken group or the Beer group for $42m.

4 Trans-Israel Highway bidders submit offers

By DAVID HARRIS

The four companies competing for the NIS 700 million contract to build the main section of the Trans-Israel Highway officially submitted their tender bids yesterday.

The consortia were invited in September to compete for the tender to build the 90-kilometer stretch from just west of Shohesh in the South to Rosh Ha'ayin in the North.

The contract will be awarded for the financing, road laying and operation of the section, which will be a toll road. The successful bidder will manage the road for 30 years.

Those competing are: Israel Transport Ventures, which is led by Transroute International (France) and Yona Group, along with Atkinson Middle East (US), Balfour Beatty (UK), Shapir, Ravad, and others.

Blue and White Lanes, which includes consortium leader Bouygues (France), Autostrade (Italy), Hochtief (Germany), Housing and Construction and Mashav Derech Eretz Consortium, led by Africa Israel Investments Ltd. and Canadian Highways Investment Corp., together with Societe Generale d'Enterprises (France), Hughes Aircraft Systems International (US), Cofiroute (France), Danya-Cebus Construction, Kfar Giladi Quarries Malibu Israel Ltd., and Alon Oil Company.

Israel Kingsway Group, fronted by Dragados (Spain) and including the Israel Corporation, Reichman Bros. (Shomron) Ltd., Ashtroum Engineering Co. Ltd., and Property and Building Ltd.

The tender is expected to be awarded before the end of this year, with work starting early in 1998.

The successful bidder must undertake to complete the project within five years.

Eventually, the minimum four-lane highway will run from just south of Kiryat Gat to Yokne'am, with possible additions to Rosh Hanikra and beyond Beersheba.

Blair puts monetary policy in Bank of England's hands

Chancellor Gordon Brown's historic move coupled with 0.25% rate rise

By DIRK BEVERIDGE

LONDON (AP) - New Treasury chief Gordon Brown shook Britain's monetary foundations yesterday, giving the Bank of England the power to set interest rates without permission from the government.

On his first full business day as chancellor of the exchequer, Brown announced "the most radical internal reform to the Bank of England since it was established in 1694 - over 300 years ago."

Brown, plunging into his job at lightning speed, had just moments earlier raised interest rates by a quarter point. Without quick "corrective action," Brown said, Britain would miss its inflation target of 2.5 percent next year.

The change at the Bank of England is massive for London's financial center, where the central bank is known as the "old lady of Threadneedle Street," but basically brings Britain more in line with monetary policy mechanisms in other rich industrialized nations.

"Our record on inflation and interest rates over recent years is poor, while other countries with independent central banks have performed better," Brown said.

Analysis had expected the new Labor government to nudge interest rates higher this week. Brown came through by lifting the central bank's minimum lending rate to 6.25% from 6%, even quicker than the markets had guessed, then announced any further adjustments will be made independently by the bank.

The former Conservative chancellor, Kenneth Clarke, had for months rejected the Bank of England's urgings for higher interest rates, saying that inflation had been tamed and higher rates could slow the economic recovery.

Bank of England Governor Eddie George had worried that inflationary pressures were growing too strong - but under the old system George could not act without the chancellor's approval.

From now on, the Labor government will set inflation targets and then leave the central bank free to put interest rates where it chooses, Brown said after meeting in the morning with George, a day ahead of schedule.

Despite the bank's new independence, Brown will have strong political input into the makeup of a nine-member committee that will set interest rates. The chancellor will appoint some members directly and consult with George on the others.

Brown is modeling the Bank of England much more closely after the US Federal Reserve - which can adjust rates even if that causes short-term political discomfort to whoever happens to be in the White House.

"I will not shrink from the tough decisions needed to deliver stability for long-term growth," Brown said - hoping to reassure financial markets that Labor will be fiscally responsible after shifting away from its old so-called tax-and-spend policies of the 1970s when it last held power.

"I have therefore decided to give the Bank of England operational responsibility for setting interest rates, with immediate effect," Brown said.

Circulation down in 6 of 10 major US papers

By FARRELL KRAMER

NEW YORK (AP) - Circulation declined at six of the 10 biggest newspapers in the US during the most recent reporting period, though profits at major newspaper companies have been coming on strong.

The circulation weakness came as the industry felt the effects of newspaper price increases and cutbacks of costly deliveries to outlying areas. While the circulation data, released to the media Monday, caused some concern, analysts felt they were far from disastrous.

The newspaper industry is very large and profitable, said John Morton, a newspaper industry analyst at Morton Research, although it's a disturbing long-term trend.

Of the 10 biggest papers, only USA Today, the Los Angeles Times, Newsday and the San Francisco Chronicle posted circulation gains, according to the Audit Bureau of Circulations for the six months ended March 31.

USA Today, the US's second-biggest newspaper, saw circulation improve 2.7 percent from 1.62 million to 1.66 million.

The Los Angeles Times had the biggest percentage gain of the top 10 - 4.7% to 1.07 million from 1.02 million. Newsday improved 0.7% from 555,203 to 559,233, while the San Francisco Chronicle added 0.03% to 494,093.

Circulation at the US's largest paper, The Wall Street Journal, dropped 0.2% to 1.84 million. The New York Times fell 4.4%, the biggest percentage decline in the top 10, from 1.16 million to 1.11 million.

The Washington Post reported a 1.8% drop to 818,231 from 833,427.

The Newspaper Association of America, an industry trade group, calculated that the bureau figures for all dailies showed a combined 1.2% circulation decline.

Circulation gains were seen in 33% of the papers, which had a total circulation of more than 51 million.

Kahalani brothers' appeal turned down

The Supreme Court yesterday denied the appeal of Eitan and Yehoyada Kahalani against their conviction for attempted murder, conspiracy to commit murder, and possessing an unlicensed weapon. The court also rejected their appeal against their 12-year sentences. In September 1994, the Kahalanis stopped an Arab on the way from Jerusalem to his village of Kafr Batir, and Eitan aimed an M-16 at his head, and pulled the trigger. But the gun did not fire because the firing pin had been taken out earlier by the General Security Service. Itim

Archeologists attacked at excavation

Archeologists working in Kafr Yasif, near Acre, were attacked by two haredim who arrived at the site and began causing disturbances yesterday. The two began cursing the archeologists, calling them "Nazis," spitting on them, and pushing them in an attempt to halt the excavations. One of the archeologists needed medical attention. Police arrested the two. The archeologists expressed shock at the attack, noting that no bones had been found at the site. In another incident, dozens of haredim caused disturbances at an excavation near Ofakim, claiming Jewish graves were at the site, and forced archeologists to halt work. Itim

Underworld figure found murdered

The body of underworld figure Alon Ahrak was found yesterday morning about a kilometer north of Kfar Shmaryahu. He had been shot several times in the chest and head from close range. The murderers left NIS 6,000 in his wallet, indicating the motive for the killing was not robbery. Because residents of Rehov Fardess in Kfar Shmaryahu reported hearing gunshots during the night, police theorize that Ahrak was murdered there, and then his body was driven away and dumped alongside the road. Ahrak was known to police as a criminal, allegedly specializing in protection rackets in Bat Yam. Raine Marcus

Netanyahu: War with Syria unlikely

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN

Contrary to persistent media reports, the prospects of war breaking out any time soon are unlikely and peace will come. Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu said before taking a ride in an air force F-15 yesterday. Dressed in flight overalls and flanked by Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai and OC Air Force Maj.-Gen. Eitan Ben-Elivahu, the prime minister said on a visit to Tel Nof Air Force Base that Israel also has an answer to a new deadly nerve gas in the Syrian arsenal. "I don't think we are facing new or special threats. There are no danger signs of war. This danger always exists and we are always ready for it - the IDF and the air force are doing what is necessary, but we have no new signs that suggests war is close," Netanyahu said. "Contrary to the negative line some analysts have taken, I believe that in the course of the coming year we will advance toward and also reach peace with some of our neighbors," he said. Reports that Syria has developed a nerve gas called VX are not new, said Netanyahu. "We found out about it more than six months ago, so it's not new. We are certainly aware of the fact that there is a missile threat, which has been erected around us over the past six or seven years. They are getting hold of warheads. There is nothing new about it. There is no leap forward either," Netanyahu said. "We are aware of it and the IDF is prepared to meet these problems and we have an answer. We are developing new answers as well," the prime minister said.

Netanyahu met with pilots and praised the role of the air force in the defense of the state, promising to make sure its vital needs are maintained in future budgets. Pilots told Netanyahu they fear the images of the air force and its career officers had been eroded and harmed among the public due to what they called "bad press" over accidents and high wages. "I told them," Netanyahu said. "That I believe there is great appreciation among Israel's citizens, who understand fundamentally that the safety of Israel and its existence is primarily dependent on this backbone of the IDF." He then turned and climbed into the back seat of a waiting F-15, named "Flying High," for his first supersonic flight, piloted by squadron commander Lt.-Col. S.

Abu Marzook to resume activities, Hamas says

By MARILYN HENRY and news agencies

Mousa Abu Marzook, who arrived in Jordan on Monday, plans to resume his political activities following his deportation from the United States, a Hamas spokesman said yesterday. "He is doing fine, his health is good and his morale is high," spokesman Ibrahim Ghosheh told The Associated Press. "There are no conditions to prevent him from resuming political activities and he will do so soon," he said.

Hamas sources said Abu Marzook, the former chief of Hamas's political bureau, was staying at a rented apartment in the suburbs of Amman. State Minister for Information Samir Mutaweh said that Abu Marzook will be free to "conduct his life like any other [person], abiding by the laws of the country." Mutaweh stressed that Jordan received the Palestinian militant leader on humanitarian grounds. A US resident for 15 years, Abu Marzook was detained in July 1995 when he re-entered the United States because his name had been added to a list of suspected terrorists. He has admitted to leading Hamas's political wing, but insists he was not involved with the group's military wing, which has claimed responsibility for attacks in Israel. Israel recently dropped its request for Abu Marzook's extradition as a suspect in 10 terrorist attacks from 1990 to 1994 that killed 47 people. The deal that led to Abu Marzook's deportation was essentially the same one that he had proposed when he was first detained in the US. In addition to pleading "no contest," he gave up his permanent residence status in the US, which he has had since 1982. Israel's extradition request for Abu Marzook created an embarrassing and increasingly untenable legal situation, because Abu Marzook was detained in solitary confinement at a federal prison in New York for 22 months, but he faced no criminal charges in the US.

Remembrance Day for the Fallen of Israel's Wars and Independence Day will take place on Sunday and Monday, according to their calendar dates. The two-day observance will not be postponed as Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Day was. "Holocaust Remembrance Day was postponed from Sunday to Monday at the request of Yad Vashem," said Moti Shilo, communications director of the Tourism Ministry, in charge of all official ceremonies. "The people who had to get to many of the ceremonies are elderly; Yad Vashem didn't want to make anyone violate the Sabbath to attend the ceremonies." Shilo said the Defense Ministry, which is in charge of the events for Remembrance Day, agreed to start ceremonies at 10 p.m. so people will not have to violate the Sabbath to participate. The first siren marking a one-minute moment of silence for Israel's fallen soldiers will sound at 10 p.m. on Saturday night, and a two-minute siren will sound at 11 a.m. on Sunday. The opening ceremony for Remembrance Day will take place in Jerusalem at 10 p.m. on Saturday night at the Western Wall. To avoid confusion in the future, the Knesset has unanimously approved an amendment to the "Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Day Law," which states that if Holocaust Remembrance Day falls on a Sunday, it will be postponed to the following day.
